Whether to use a pump or not is a personal decision. You can manage your diabetes equally well with pumps or multiple injections, so it reduces to your preferences. Choosing one method on the other is not a commitment to life. Some people go ahead and out of their pumps (but this should always be done with instructions from a person's diabetes care team). Remember that a pump is only a tool: you can achieve the goals of blood sugar with a pump or injections. But here are some things to consider ... The safety of the pump is a commitment that the only absolute requirement for using a pump is that you and/or your caregiver are ready and willing to do what it takes to use the pump safely. Most diabetes providers and insurance companies need to check blood glucose at least four times a day before they go on an insulin pump. Blood glucose control is important because it will alert you if your pump stops working right, or the infusion set stops working. This can cause high blood sugar levels and because you can enter diabetes ketoacidosis, which is very serious and dangerous. Control of blood glucose levels will frequently alert you to this possibility and prevent the development of ketones. A pump could be considered for: people who like the idea of a pump. If this is what you want, or you want for your son, and it can be used safely, then it should be used. Active people, who benefit from changes in base rates or suspend the pump during exercise. People who have frequent blood glucose reactions. Anyone who has delays in the absorption of food from the stomach (gastroparesis). Womenthe pregnancy. People who want to use the functions of the pump bus calculator to determine the doses of the insulin. Other factors to consider: the insulin pump does not remove the need to control blood glucose and give insulin before the meal. There are technical aspects for using a pump ... configuration, putting it, interacting with it "which are more complicated in some ways ways injections. It only gives insulin to a shorter recitation. If it breaks or falls off, the person wearing it must be ready to give insulin by` sigliection&e`~`Ä; of time is needed. It's expensive, so find out which pumps are covered by your insurance and if those pumps meet your needs. All pumps are a piece of extra hardware connected to your body, with a tube or attached to your skin. There are many smart ways to wear pumps and hide them from view, but they take you a little getting used to at first. It is a choice that most people use its pump continuously, but it is not a permanent part of the body. Some children use it during the school year but not during the summer. Others return injections when they go on vacation. Some have problems with their infusion sites, so they go to the pump for a while to get their sites recovered. Whatever works to make diabetes treatment easier and better. A`Ä` There are a number of pumps on the market. Find out what's best for you / your child. Check out the individual Pump Company sites and read bloggers who have experience using pumps. Talk to your diabetes team. Most insurance companies won't pay for a new pump more often than every four years, so this is a device you'll have for a while. Finally, remember that this is not a permanent decision.
