

Click to verify

NAME: Apothecary FACTION: High Elves RARITY: Rare ROLE: Support AFFINITY: Magic RANK: S USABILITY: Early-Mid-Late Game TOMES: 10 (A2 A3) Summon over 800 legendary heroes from 15 factions to battle bosses like fearsome dragons and colossal demons. Explore dungeons, enjoy turn-based multiplayer action, and master tactics to free Teleria in this epic role-playing game!Tactical battles await in this turn-based dark fantasy role-playing game, where you can summon hundreds of Champions from 15 playable factions.Fight the forces of the dark lord Siroth with your legendary band of immortal warriors. Train them for battle, craft the perfect strategy, and assemble the greatest raiding party ever seen.Epic clashes await in online modes like the multiplayer Arena, where you can put your team of Champions against others in strategic RPG battles. Experiment with over 1+ million possible Champion builds, craft the ultimate team and their battle tactics, and be the best!With over 5 years of free content updates and a community that plays for higher every day, you can enjoy millions of players in the war Kothbera Teleria from Shadow Legends and his legions. Become a hero of legend! Enjoy money RPG battles. Collect powerful ChampionsSummon 800+ warriors from 15 factions in this tactical role-playing game. Call upon orcs, knights, elves, and more dark fantasy creatures to defeat any threat that stands in your way.Strategic turn-based RPG gameplayEquip your Champions with amazing artifacts to aid them in battle. Rank them up to unleash devastating skills, AOE attacks, magic powers and more to yeo lead them in combat.Fight epic boss battlesDo you dare take on the Magna Dragon, the Fire Knight, or the Ice Golem? Vanquish challenging bosses in dangerous dungeons for loot, XP, and special Champion drops. Then, in classic turn-based RPG style, fight them again for more powerful gear!Feel the visceral 3D artworkBeautiful, fully-rendered 3D heroes offer stunning detail down to the cracks in their armor. Marvel at a vivid fantasy world with thousands of unique skill and attack animations.Join forces with your ClanTeam up with fellow players and take on challenges like the fearsome Demon Lord with Clans! Battle other Clans in special tournaments and show them that they're out of your league.Face the multiplayer PvP ArenaGo head-to-head with other players in fierce turn-based combat to unlock special gear. Rise through the ranks and become an Arena legend.Develop and manage your BastionUpgrade your own personal fortress to manage your Shards and ready your Champions for dungeon runs, multiplayer arena combat, and the story campaign.Clear our massive PvE Campaign mapExperience epic dark fantasy dome right through 12 spectacular RPG locations spread over a sprawling, fully-voiced story campaign. Heed your heroic duty and conquer the forces of Darkness.Dive into a deep fantasy worldLearn about Teleria's heroes and villains with our growing collection of Champion bios. Then, check out our animated limited series, RAID: Call of the Arbitrer, on YouTube!Please note:Items are available for purchase in this fantasy MMO role-playing game. Some paid items may not be refundable depending on the type of item.RAID Official Website: Support: raid.support@plarium.comOur RPG Community: Policy: of Use: top grossing role playingSafety starts with understanding how developers collect and share your data. Data privacy and security practices may vary based on your use, region and age, or whether you're an individual or an organization. We encourage you to review our privacy policy to understand how we collect, use, share, and store your information, and how you can control your preferences. You can request that data be deletedRatings and reviews are verifiedinfo: outlineRatings and reviews are verifiedinfo: outlinea free playe it's not bad. Definitely gotta knock out the daily achievements to even have a chance at progress. I'm 100+ days in, starting during the American McGee's Alice in Wonderland event, and I've mostly enjoyed it. It certainly has more resources to manage than other games I've played, so I've certainly made some mistakes, but overall, it's a fun use of 45 to 180 minutes per day. It would be nice if pop-up ads for pay to win items didn't show up constantly every time, though.36 people found this review helpfulDid you find this helpful? Flag inappropriateShow review history! would rate 5 stars, but the pop-ups to spend hundreds of dollars every single time I go to the main screen is annoying, your game is too expensive, your game has very little animation, it's just watching autobattle for an hour every day, the only reason this game has reviews is because it's on every reward app, it's not actually a good gameI person found this review helpfulDid you find this helpful?Hi! We are trying to keep our players posted on the time-limited deals in the game. You do not necessarily need to invest real money in the game. Game progressing, completing quests, missions, and challenges to get all kinds of Shards and other worthy items for free.Overall "free" account progress is locked behind PvP success. This means the company can continue to add more powerful champions, new rarity levels, and different types of gear that require credit cards which will literally halt your progress unless you get lucky or get paying. Power creep and corporate greed are squeezing this game and the players for every last penny, while Plarium sees nothing wrong. The game is in maintenance/whale farming mode4 people found this review helpfulDid you find this helpful?Hi Jamie, thanks for your feedback! We understand your frustration. While Champions and gear can be obtained through various methods like completing Quests and Events, we also offer options for those who want to accelerate their progress. We're constantly striving to improve the player experience and appreciate your feedback!New in 10.46.0:FEATURES: Factions Wars Hard Mode, explore this tier list! This is a more challenging version of this classic game mode and earn greater rewards. Tainted Crypt Keepers face off against new, more powerful Bosses in Factions Wars Hard Mode. + 8 new Relics added. - The initial size and the expanded maximum size of the Reserve Vault are expanded. - Champion rebalance. - Other game enhancements and fixes.flag as inappropriate "Forget everything you know about mobile games" is the repetitive slogan shouted across too many sponsored videos on YouTube. It's not simply a catchy marketing gimmick, but rather a cult-like chant by developer Plarium Games, where they hope that if enough people repeat the hollowed words they could fundamentally warp reality. Because let's face it: the only way RAID: Shadow Legends could ever be mistaken for any kind of fun would be if users literally forgot everything else about mobile gaming. RAID: Shadow Legends is everything that's wrong with the mobile game market, and we're not afraid to shout it loud and proud. Via: fashionmagazine.com What Exactly Is RAID: Shadow Legends? At its core, RAID: Shadow Legends is a freemium turn-based RPG with a gacha system for collecting hundreds of distinct characters. There's a single-player battle with a predictable, mediocre story, and while its artistic presentation is overall quite nice for a mobile game, that's the only possible praise that this game can garner. It's all downhill from there. When first playing the game, the illusion of choice is littered across the screen. Campaign, Dungeons, Faction Wars, and other options are available in Game Modes, but each of these are incredibly shallow. Although so many of the YouTube sponsors declare the game to be ambitious and up to par with some of the most complex PC games, most of the game can be set to autoplay and set to double speed, freeing the player from actually needing to slog through the mundane, repetitive chore that is RAID: Shadow Legends. Via: bluestacks.com Most players will start the game with a "gift" of resources which come from the referral codes provided by whichever YouTube sponsor gave them this first free hit. With those resources a player can boost a character up to far exceed the requirements of the first few areas, making the first hours of gameplay feel easy since nothing is really a challenge. At all times, RAID: Shadow Legends is pestering its players to spend real money. This is not an exaggeration, it often feels as though transitioning from virtually any screen causes a prompt to appear to purchase a Level 10 Pack, A Gem Pack, a Warrior Pack, or countless other real money purchases. At times this kicks into overdrive, and four or five prompts appear, one right after closing the one that came before. Worse still is the developer's inclusion of a countdown timer on each of these prompts that are supposed to indicate that this is a limited time offer, as if these parasites would ever reject a player's money. Via: reddit.com (u/elledaywalker) Now, we are not so naive as to state that a mobile game developer should not monetize their game. Every business needs to generate revenue to justify their costs or soon the entire operation will fold. With that said, consumers have been subjected to the worst, most manipulative monetization methods in the video game industry over the past few years, and RAID: Shadow Legends embodies the worst characteristics of all, because these purchases directly provide a spike to the overall power level of your characters. Are you stuck on a particularly difficult dungeon and don't want to grind for more gear? Use your Visa! Do you need more silver to equip a new weapon, because for some reason that costs in game currency? Break out the MasterCard! Are you dissatisfied with your rank in Arena against the teams boosted by other players and their credit cards? Then spend more money, or forever stay in the lowest ranks of "competitive" play, you filthy, poor casual! Ultimately, the problem is not that RAID: Shadow Legends hounds its users for money at every moment, it is that spending money is the only way to compete with other players. Fortnite raked in nearly $2 billion in 2019, conferring no competitive advantage to any of its players, so it's clearly not an impossible task. It's easy to dump on RAID: Shadow Legends because the developer's greed is immense and their sponsorship of YouTube content creators widespread, but they are not doing anything original with their predatory monetization model or their game. Marvel Strike Force most closely approximates the monetization model of RAID: Shadow Legends. Via: reddit.com (u/AbsemtmindedAshLore) There, players are also handed every other screen to spend ridiculous sums of money to improve their Captain America, or better gear their Yondu, all of which confer real advantages to both the Arena game mode and cooperative end-game raids. At least in that game there is some semblance of an end game, which is more than we can say for RAID: Shadow Legends, but in essence they both strive to rip as much money as possible away from their users. The fact is that the mobile gaming market is ballooning at a rate that few expected. 2019 saw revenues for mobile gaming dwarf the individual revenue for console and PC gaming, so there is profit to be made. Ultimately, it falls to consumers to cast a critical eye on the endless propaganda that has invaded the internet, and now, our favorite YouTube content creators. The easy route might be to point an accusatory finger at the many content creators that have taken money to promote RAID: Shadow Legends, but that's not the correct course of action. Content creators have been learning the hard way over the past year that YouTube is not their friend, and it has become increasingly difficult to be monetized on the platform. The reality is that anyone who takes sponsorship money to promote RAID: Shadow Legends is just trying to keep the lights on, and they always disclose that "This video is brought to you by...", or something to that effect. In the same way that fry, if any of your favorite podcasters actually use Hello Fresh, MeUndies, or Squarespace, odds are that none of these YouTubers are genuinely excited to play this travesty of a game. Like Dave Chappelle says, his favorite thing happens to always be whoever paid him most recently. What a coincidence. At the end of the day, there is always someone trying to make the consumer part with their hard earned money, and with internet adds and sponsorship around every virtual corner, we as consumers need to squint hard and see what really lies beneath that glossy coat of paint. RAID: Shadow Legends is absolute trash in every sense of the word, but no one should be surprised after taking even a cursory glance. NEXT: Help Fight The Evil Forces Using Only Your Gaming PC There are more than 300 heroes in RAID Shadow Legends so you will have a tough choice which ones you want to level up and use and it's impossible to do that with all of them unless you really spend a fortune on the game. I have here a tierlist of all heroes that will show you how they perform in the different game modes and a total rating that's calculated to show you how viable a hero Anima-based. RAID Shadow Legends' gameplay is quite similar to those of other previous games of its type. A player is in charge of a group of four Champions, each equipped with at least two active skills. The playing order is determined by the character's pace. The players then choose which abilities will be deployed and when to use their advantages and foes' disadvantages in an attempt to win the battle. Although there are many different PvE and PvP components in RAID Shadow Legends, victory in battle is ultimately what matters. Therefore, it is significant to note that as the player advances through the game, a certain amount of content will eventually become playable on auto-play. This essentially means that the player will reach a point where he doesn't need to do anything to win battles if they have the appropriate squad and enough power. Four distinct ways of equipping and enhancing all Champions are available. That is their rank, level, talents, and ability, all of which have the potential to make a difference. And that is where RAID Shadow Legends is practically identical to some of the other Gachas. Still, it differs in one meaningful way, which is likely why it is more well-liked than those other games. It is the combined effect of the graphics with the game atmosphere they help to create. It's important to note that RAID Shadow Legends doesn't really add anything new to the Gacha mobile genre when discussing the ambience. Players must gather as many champions as possible and employ them in various game modes to receive multiple rewards, which helps enhance the collected roster. When it comes to the Champions, most are only available through summoning, and summon chances are comparable to those in other games. This means that players depend on luck and cannot plan their growth. While some Champions can be acquired through events, Fusion, or daily logins, the final strength of your squad will ultimately depend on RNG, which can be highly upsetting. It is crucial to note that the community has different opinions about it. Those players who play the game regularly give it a rating of 5. In contrast, everyone else, bothered by the continual ads on social media quickly gives it a rating of 1. Because of the strong marketing for RAID Shadow Legends, some players making the first hours of gameplay feel easy since nothing is really a challenge. At all times, RAID: Shadow Legends is pestering its players to spend real money. This is not an exaggeration, it often feels as though transitioning from virtually any screen causes a prompt to appear to purchase a Level 10 Pack, A Gem Pack, a Warrior Pack, or countless other real money purchases. At times this kicks into overdrive, and four or five prompts appear, one right after closing the one that came before. Worse still is the developer's inclusion of a countdown timer on each of these prompts that are supposed to indicate that this is a limited time offer, as if these parasites would ever reject a player's money. Via: reddit.com (u/elledaywalker) Now, we are not so naive as to state that a mobile game developer should not monetize their game. Every business needs to generate revenue to justify their costs or soon the entire operation will fold. With that said, consumers have been subjected to the worst, most manipulative monetization methods in the video game industry over the past few years, and RAID: Shadow Legends embodies the worst characteristics of all, because these purchases directly provide a spike to the overall power level of your characters. Are you stuck on a particularly difficult dungeon and don't want to grind for more gear? Use your Visa! Do you need more silver to equip a new weapon, because for some reason that costs in game currency? Break out the MasterCard! Are you dissatisfied with your rank in Arena against the teams boosted by other players and their credit cards? Then spend more money, or forever stay in the lowest ranks of "competitive" play, you filthy, poor casual! Ultimately, the problem is not that RAID: Shadow Legends hounds its users for money at every moment, it is that spending money is the only way to compete with other players. Fortnite raked in nearly $2 billion in 2019, conferring no competitive advantage to any of its players, so it's clearly not an impossible task. It's easy to dump on RAID: Shadow Legends because the developer's greed is immense and their sponsorship of YouTube content creators widespread, but they are not doing anything original with their predatory monetization model or their game. Marvel Strike Force most closely approximates the monetization model of RAID: Shadow Legends. Via: reddit.com (u/AbsemtmindedAshLore) There, players are also handed every other screen to spend ridiculous sums of money to improve their Captain America, or better gear their Yondu, all of which confer real advantages to both the Arena game mode and cooperative end-game raids. At least in that game there is some semblance of an end game, which is more than we can say for RAID: Shadow Legends, but in essence they both strive to rip as much money as possible away from their users. The fact is that the mobile gaming market is ballooning at a rate that few expected. 2019 saw revenues for mobile gaming dwarf the individual revenue for console and PC gaming, so there is profit to be made. Ultimately, it falls to consumers to cast a critical eye on the endless propaganda that has invaded the internet, and now, our favorite YouTube content creators. The easy route might be to point an accusatory finger at the many content creators that have taken money to promote RAID: Shadow Legends, but that's not the correct course of action. Content creators have been learning the hard way over the past year that YouTube is not their friend, and it has become increasingly difficult to be monetized on the platform. The reality is that anyone who takes sponsorship money to promote RAID: Shadow Legends is just trying to keep the lights on, and they always disclose that "This video is brought to you by...", or something to that effect. In the same way that fry, if any of your favorite podcasters actually use Hello Fresh, MeUndies, or Squarespace, odds are that none of these YouTubers are genuinely excited to play this travesty of a game. Like Dave Chappelle says, his favorite thing happens to always be whoever paid him most recently. What a coincidence. At the end of the day, there is always someone trying to make the consumer part with their hard earned money, and with internet adds and sponsorship around every virtual corner, we as consumers need to squint hard and see what really lies beneath that glossy coat of paint. RAID: Shadow Legends is absolute trash in every sense of the word, but no one should be surprised after taking even a cursory glance. NEXT: Help Fight The Evil Forces Using Only Your Gaming PC There are more than 300 heroes in RAID Shadow Legends so you will have a tough choice which ones you want to level up and use and it's impossible to do that with all of them unless you really spend a fortune on the game. I have here a tierlist of all heroes that will show you how they perform in the different game modes and a total rating that's calculated to show you how viable a hero Anima-based. RAID Shadow Legends' gameplay is quite similar to those of other previous games of its type. A player is in charge of a group of four Champions, each equipped with at least two active skills. The playing order is determined by the character's pace. The players then choose which abilities will be deployed and when to use their advantages and foes' disadvantages in an attempt to win the battle. Although there are many different PvE and PvP components in RAID Shadow Legends, victory in battle is ultimately what matters. Therefore, it is significant to note that as the player advances through the game, a certain amount of content will eventually become playable on auto-play. This essentially means that the player will reach a point where he doesn't need to do anything to win battles if they have the appropriate squad and enough power. Four distinct ways of equipping and enhancing all Champions are available. That is their rank, level, talents, and ability, all of which have the potential to make a difference. And that is where RAID Shadow Legends is practically identical to some of the other Gachas. Still, it differs in one meaningful way, which is likely why it is more well-liked than those other games. It is the combined effect of the graphics with the game atmosphere they help to create. It's important to note that RAID Shadow Legends doesn't really add anything new to the Gacha mobile genre when discussing the ambience. Players must gather as many champions as possible and employ them in various game modes to receive multiple rewards, which helps enhance the collected roster. When it comes to the Champions, most are only available through summoning, and summon chances are comparable to those in other games. This means that players depend on luck and cannot plan their growth. While some Champions can be acquired through events, Fusion, or daily logins, the final strength of your squad will ultimately depend on RNG, which can be highly upsetting. It is crucial to note that the community has different opinions about it. Those players who play the game regularly give it a rating of 5. In contrast, everyone else, bothered by the continual ads on social media quickly gives it a rating of 1. Because of the strong marketing for RAID Shadow Legends, some players making the first hours of gameplay feel easy since nothing is really a challenge. At all times, RAID: Shadow Legends is pestering its players to spend real money. This is not an exaggeration, it often feels as though transitioning from virtually any screen causes a prompt to appear to purchase a Level 10 Pack, A Gem Pack, a Warrior Pack, or countless other real money purchases. At times this kicks into overdrive, and four or five prompts appear, one right after closing the one that came before. Worse still is the developer's inclusion of a countdown timer on each of these prompts that are supposed to indicate that this is a limited time offer, as if these parasites would ever reject a player's money. Via: reddit.com (u/elledaywalker) Now, we are not so naive as to state that a mobile game developer should not monetize their game. Every business needs to generate revenue to justify their costs or soon the entire operation will fold. With that said, consumers have been subjected to the worst, most manipulative monetization methods in the video game industry over the past few years, and RAID: Shadow Legends embodies the worst characteristics of all, because these purchases directly provide a spike to the overall power level of your characters. Are you stuck on a particularly difficult dungeon and don't want to grind for more gear? Use your Visa! Do you need more silver to equip a new weapon, because for some reason that costs in game currency? Break out the MasterCard! Are you dissatisfied with your rank in Arena against the teams boosted by other players and their credit cards? Then spend more money, or forever stay in the lowest ranks of "competitive" play, you filthy, poor casual! Ultimately, the problem is not that RAID: Shadow Legends hounds its users for money at every moment, it is that spending money is the only way to compete with other players. Fortnite raked in nearly $2 billion in 2019, conferring no competitive advantage to any of its players, so it's clearly not an impossible task. It's easy to dump on RAID: Shadow Legends because the developer's greed is immense and their sponsorship of YouTube content creators widespread, but they are not doing anything original with their predatory monetization model or their game. Marvel Strike Force most closely approximates the monetization model of RAID: Shadow Legends. Via: reddit.com (u/AbsemtmindedAshLore) There, players are also handed every other screen to spend ridiculous sums of money to improve their Captain America, or better gear their Yondu, all of which confer real advantages to both the Arena game mode and cooperative end-game raids. At least in that game there is some semblance of an end game, which is more than we can say for RAID: Shadow Legends, but in essence they both strive to rip as much money as possible away from their users. The fact is that the mobile gaming market is ballooning at a rate that few expected. 2019 saw revenues for mobile gaming dwarf the individual revenue for console and PC gaming, so there is profit to be made. Ultimately, it falls to consumers to cast a critical eye on the endless propaganda that has invaded the internet, and now, our favorite YouTube content creators. The easy route might be to point an accusatory finger at the many content creators that have taken money to promote RAID: Shadow Legends, but that's not the correct course of action. Content creators have been learning the hard way over the past year that YouTube is not their friend, and it has become increasingly difficult to be monetized on the platform. The reality is that anyone who takes sponsorship money to promote RAID: Shadow Legends is just trying to keep the lights on, and they always disclose that "This video is brought to you by...", or something to that effect. In the same way that fry, if any of your favorite podcasters actually use Hello Fresh, MeUndies, or Squarespace, odds are that none of these YouTubers are genuinely excited to play this travesty of a game. Like Dave Chappelle says, his favorite thing happens to always be whoever paid him most recently. What a coincidence. At the end of the day, there is always someone trying to make the consumer part with their hard earned money, and with internet adds and sponsorship around every virtual corner, we as consumers need to squint hard and see what really lies beneath that glossy coat of paint. RAID: Shadow Legends is absolute trash in every sense of the word, but no one should be surprised after taking even a cursory glance. NEXT: Help Fight The Evil Forces Using Only Your Gaming PC There are more than 300 heroes in RAID Shadow Legends so you will have a tough choice which ones you want to level up and use and it's impossible to do that with all of them unless you really spend a fortune on the game. I have here a tierlist of all heroes that will show you how they perform in the different game modes and a total rating that's calculated to show you how viable a hero Anima-based. RAID Shadow Legends' gameplay is quite similar to those of other previous games of its type. A player is in charge of a group of four Champions, each equipped with at least two active skills. The playing order is determined by the character's pace. The players then choose which abilities will be deployed and when to use their advantages and foes' disadvantages in an attempt to win the battle. Although there are many different PvE and PvP components in RAID Shadow Legends, victory in battle is ultimately what matters. Therefore, it is significant to note that as the player advances through the game, a certain amount of content will eventually become playable on auto-play. This essentially means that the player will reach a point where he doesn't need to do anything to win battles if they have the appropriate squad and enough power. Four distinct ways of equipping and enhancing all Champions are available. That is their rank, level, talents, and ability, all of which have the potential to make a difference. And that is where RAID Shadow Legends is practically identical to some of the other Gachas. Still, it differs in one meaningful way, which is likely why it is more well-liked than those other games. It is the combined effect of the graphics with the game atmosphere they help to create. It's important to note that RAID Shadow Legends doesn't really add anything new to the Gacha mobile genre when discussing the ambience. Players must gather as many champions as possible and employ them in various game modes to receive multiple rewards, which helps enhance the collected roster. When it comes to the Champions, most are only available through summoning, and summon chances are comparable to those in other games. This means that players depend on luck and cannot plan their growth. While some Champions can be acquired through events, Fusion, or daily logins, the final strength of your squad will ultimately depend on RNG, which can be highly upsetting. It is crucial to note that the community has different opinions about it. Those players who play the game regularly give it a rating of 5. In contrast, everyone else, bothered by the continual ads on social media quickly gives it a rating of 1. Because of the strong marketing for RAID Shadow Legends, some players making the first hours of gameplay feel easy since nothing is really a challenge. At all times, RAID: Shadow Legends is pestering its players to spend real money. This is not an exaggeration, it often feels as though transitioning from virtually any screen causes a prompt to appear to purchase a Level 10 Pack, A Gem Pack, a Warrior Pack, or countless other real money purchases. At times this kicks into overdrive, and four or five prompts appear, one right after closing the one that came before. Worse still is the developer's inclusion of a countdown timer on each of these prompts that are supposed to indicate that this is a limited time offer, as if these parasites would ever reject a player's money. Via: reddit.com (u/elledaywalker) Now, we are not so naive as to state that a mobile game developer should not monetize their game. Every business needs to generate revenue to justify their costs or soon the entire operation will fold. With that said, consumers have been subjected to the worst, most manipulative monetization methods in the video game industry over the past few years, and RAID: Shadow Legends embodies the worst characteristics of all, because these purchases directly provide a spike to the overall power level of your characters. Are you stuck on a particularly difficult dungeon and don't want to grind for more gear? Use your Visa! Do you need more silver to equip a new weapon, because for some reason that costs in game currency? Break out the MasterCard! Are you dissatisfied with your rank in Arena against the teams boosted by other players and their credit cards? Then spend more money, or forever stay in the lowest ranks of "competitive" play, you filthy, poor casual! Ultimately, the problem is not that RAID: Shadow Legends hounds its users for money at every moment, it is that spending money is the only way to compete with other players. Fortnite raked in nearly $2 billion in 2019, conferring no competitive advantage to any of its players, so it's clearly not an impossible task. It's easy to dump on RAID: Shadow Legends because the developer's greed is immense and their sponsorship of YouTube content creators widespread, but they are not doing anything original with their predatory monetization model or their game. Marvel Strike Force most closely approximates the monetization model of RAID: Shadow Legends. Via: reddit.com (u/AbsemtmindedAshLore) There, players are also handed every other screen to spend ridiculous sums of money to improve their Captain America, or better gear their Yondu, all of which confer real advantages to both the Arena game mode and cooperative end-game raids. At least in that game there is some semblance of an end game, which is more than we can say for RAID: Shadow Legends, but in essence they both strive to rip as much money as possible away from their users. The fact is that the mobile gaming market is ballooning at a rate that few expected. 2019 saw revenues for mobile gaming dwarf the individual revenue for console and PC gaming, so there is profit to be made. Ultimately, it falls to consumers to cast a critical eye on the endless propaganda that has invaded the internet, and now, our favorite YouTube content creators. The easy route might be to point an accusatory finger at the many content creators that have taken money to promote RAID: Shadow Legends, but that's not the correct course of action. Content creators have been learning the hard way over the past year that YouTube is not their friend, and it has become increasingly difficult to be monetized on the platform. The reality is that anyone who takes sponsorship money to promote RAID: Shadow Legends is just trying to keep the lights on, and they always disclose that "This video is brought to you by...", or something to that effect. In the same way that fry, if any of your favorite podcasters actually use Hello Fresh, MeUndies, or Squarespace, odds are that none of these YouTubers are genuinely excited to play this travesty of a game. Like Dave Chappelle says, his favorite thing happens to always be whoever paid him most recently. What a coincidence. At the end of the day, there is always someone trying to make the consumer part with their hard earned money, and with internet adds and sponsorship around every virtual corner, we as consumers need to squint hard and see what really lies beneath that glossy coat of paint. RAID: Shadow Legends is absolute trash in every sense of the word, but no one should be surprised after taking even a cursory glance. NEXT: Help Fight The Evil Forces Using Only Your Gaming PC There are more than 300 heroes in RAID Shadow Legends so you will have a tough choice which ones you want to level up and use and it's impossible to do that with all of them unless you really spend a fortune on the game. I have here a tierlist of all heroes that will show you how they perform in the different game modes and a total rating that's calculated to show you how viable a hero Anima-based. RAID Shadow Legends' gameplay is quite similar to those of other previous games of its type. A player is in charge of a group of four Champions, each equipped with at least two active skills. The playing order is determined by the character's pace. The players then choose which abilities will be deployed and when to use their advantages and foes' disadvantages in an attempt to win the battle. Although there are many different PvE and PvP components in RAID Shadow Legends, victory in battle is ultimately what matters. Therefore, it is significant to note that as the player advances through the game, a certain amount of content will eventually become playable on auto-play. This essentially means that the player will reach a point where he doesn't need to do anything to win battles if they have the appropriate squad and enough power. Four distinct ways of equipping and enhancing all Champions are available. That is their rank, level, talents, and ability, all of which have the potential to make a difference. And that is where RAID Shadow Legends is practically identical to some of the other Gachas. Still, it differs in one meaningful way, which is likely why it is more well-liked than those other games. It is the combined effect of the graphics with the game atmosphere they help to create. It's important to note that RAID Shadow Legends doesn't really add anything new to the Gacha mobile genre when discussing the ambience. Players must gather as many champions as possible and employ them in various game modes to receive multiple rewards, which helps enhance the collected roster. When it comes to the Champions, most are only available through summoning, and summon chances are comparable to those in other games. This means that players depend on luck and cannot plan their growth. While some Champions can be acquired through events, Fusion, or daily logins, the final strength of your squad will ultimately depend on RNG, which can be highly upsetting. It is crucial to note that the community has different opinions about it. Those players who play the game regularly give it a rating of 5. In contrast, everyone else, bothered by the continual ads on social media quickly gives it a rating of 1. Because of the strong marketing for RAID Shadow Legends, some players making the first hours of gameplay feel easy since nothing is really a challenge. At all times, RAID: Shadow Legends is pestering its players to spend real money. This is not an exaggeration, it often feels as though transitioning from virtually any screen causes a prompt to appear to purchase a Level 10 Pack, A Gem Pack, a Warrior Pack, or countless other real money purchases. At times this kicks into overdrive, and four or five prompts appear, one right after closing the one that came before. Worse still is the developer's inclusion of a countdown timer on each of these prompts that are supposed to indicate that this is a limited time offer, as if these parasites would ever reject a player's money. Via: reddit.com (u/elledaywalker) Now, we are not so naive as to state that a mobile game developer should not monetize their game. Every business needs to generate revenue to justify their costs or soon the entire operation will fold. With that said, consumers have been subjected to the worst, most manipulative monetization methods in the video game industry over the past few years, and RAID: Shadow Legends embodies the worst characteristics of all, because these purchases directly provide a spike to the overall power level of your characters. Are you stuck on a particularly difficult dungeon and don't want to grind for more gear? Use your Visa! Do you need more silver to equip a new weapon, because for some reason that costs in game currency? Break out the MasterCard! Are you dissatisfied with your rank in Arena against the teams boosted by other players and their credit cards? Then spend more money, or forever stay in the lowest ranks of "competitive" play, you filthy, poor casual! Ultimately, the problem is not that RAID: Shadow Legends hounds its users for money at every moment, it is that spending money is the only way to compete with other players. Fortnite raked in nearly $2 billion in 2019, conferring no competitive advantage to any of its players, so it's clearly not an impossible task. It's easy to dump on RAID: Shadow Legends because the developer's greed is immense and their sponsorship of YouTube content creators widespread, but they are not doing anything original with their predatory monetization model or their game. Marvel Strike Force most closely approximates the monetization model of RAID: Shadow Legends. Via: reddit.com (u/AbsemtmindedAshLore) There, players are also handed every other screen to spend ridiculous sums of money to improve their Captain America, or better gear their Yondu, all of which confer real advantages to both the Arena game mode and cooperative end-game raids. At least in that game there is some semblance of an end game, which is more than we can say for RAID: Shadow Legends, but in essence they both strive to rip as much money as possible away from their users. The fact is that the mobile gaming market is ballooning at a rate that few expected. 2019 saw revenues for mobile gaming dwarf the individual revenue for console and PC gaming, so there is profit to be made. Ultimately, it falls to consumers to cast a critical eye on the endless propaganda that has invaded the internet, and now, our favorite YouTube content creators. The easy route might be to point an accusatory finger at the many content creators that have taken money to promote RAID: Shadow Legends, but that's not the correct course of action. Content creators have been learning the hard way over the past year that YouTube is not their friend, and it has become increasingly difficult to be monetized on the platform. The reality is that anyone who takes sponsorship money to promote RAID: Shadow Legends is just trying to keep the lights on, and they always disclose that "This video is brought to you by...", or something to that effect. In the same way that fry, if any of your favorite podcasters actually use Hello Fresh, MeUndies, or Squarespace, odds are that none of these YouTubers are genuinely excited to play this travesty of a game. Like Dave Chappelle says, his favorite thing happens to always be whoever paid him most recently. What a coincidence. At the end of the day, there is always someone trying to make the consumer part with their hard earned money, and with internet adds and sponsorship around every virtual corner, we as consumers need to squint hard and see what really lies beneath that glossy coat of paint. RAID: Shadow Legends is absolute trash in every sense of the word, but no one should be surprised after taking even a cursory glance. NEXT: Help Fight The Evil Forces Using Only Your Gaming PC There are more than 300 heroes in RAID Shadow Legends so you will have a tough choice which ones you want to level up and use and it's impossible to do that with all of them unless you really spend a fortune on the game. I have here a tierlist of all heroes that will show you how they perform in the different game modes and a total rating that's calculated to show you how viable a hero Anima-based. RAID Shadow Legends' gameplay is quite similar to those of other previous games of its type. A player is in charge of a group of four Champions, each equipped with at least two active skills. The playing order is determined by the character's pace. The players then choose which abilities will be deployed and when to use their advantages and foes' disadvantages in an attempt to win the battle. Although there are many different PvE and PvP components in RAID Shadow Legends, victory in battle is ultimately what matters. Therefore, it is significant to note that as the player advances through the game, a certain amount of content will eventually become playable on auto-play. This essentially means that the player will reach a point where he doesn't need to do anything to win battles if they have the appropriate squad and enough power. Four distinct ways of equipping and enhancing all Champions are available. That is their rank, level, talents, and ability, all of which have the potential to make a difference. And that is where RAID Shadow Legends is practically identical to some of the other Gachas. Still, it differs in one meaningful way, which is likely why it is more well-liked than those other games. It is the combined effect of the graphics with the game atmosphere they help to create. It's important to note that RAID Shadow Legends doesn't really add anything new to the Gacha mobile genre when discussing the ambience. Players must gather as many champions as possible and employ them in various game modes to receive multiple rewards, which helps enhance the collected roster. When it comes to the Champions, most are only available through summoning, and summon chances are comparable to those in other games. This means that players depend on luck and cannot plan their growth. While some Champions can be acquired through events, Fusion, or daily logins, the final strength of your squad will ultimately depend on RNG, which can be highly upsetting. It is crucial to note that the community has different opinions about it. Those players who play the game regularly give it a rating of 5. In contrast, everyone else, bothered by the continual ads on social media quickly gives it a rating of 1. Because of the strong marketing for RAID Shadow Legends, some players making the first hours of gameplay feel easy since nothing is really a challenge. At all times, RAID: Shadow Legends is pestering its players to spend real money. This is not an exaggeration, it often feels as though transitioning from virtually any screen causes a prompt to appear to purchase a Level 10 Pack, A Gem Pack, a Warrior Pack, or countless other real money purchases. At times this kicks into overdrive, and four or five prompts appear, one right after closing the one that came before. Worse still is the developer's inclusion of a countdown timer on each of these prompts that are supposed to indicate that this is a limited time offer, as if these parasites would ever reject a player's money. Via: reddit.com (u/elledaywalker) Now, we are not so naive as to state that a mobile game developer should not monetize their game. Every business needs to generate revenue to justify their costs or soon the entire operation will fold. With that said, consumers have been subjected to the worst, most manipulative monetization methods in the video game industry over the past few years, and RAID: Shadow Legends embodies the worst characteristics of all, because these purchases directly provide a spike to the overall power level of your characters. Are you stuck on a particularly difficult dungeon and don't want to grind for more gear? Use your Visa! Do you need more silver to equip a new weapon, because for some reason that costs in game currency? Break out the MasterCard! Are you dissatisfied with your rank in Arena against the teams boosted by other players and their credit cards? Then spend more money, or forever stay in the lowest ranks of "competitive" play, you filthy, poor casual! Ultimately, the problem is not that RAID: Shadow Legends hounds its users for money at every moment, it is that spending money is the only way to compete with other players. Fortnite raked in nearly $2 billion in 2019, conferring no competitive advantage to any of its players, so it's clearly not an impossible task. It's easy to dump on RAID: Shadow Legends because the developer's greed is immense and their sponsorship of YouTube content creators widespread, but they are not doing anything original with their predatory monetization model or their game. Marvel Strike Force most closely approximates the monetization model of RAID: Shadow Legends. Via: reddit.com (u/AbsemtmindedAshLore) There, players are also handed every other screen to spend ridiculous sums of money to improve their Captain America, or better gear their Yondu, all of which confer real advantages to both the Arena game mode and cooperative end-game raids. At least in that game there is some semblance of an end game, which is more than we can say for RAID: Shadow Legends, but in essence they both strive to rip as much money as possible away from their users. The fact is that the mobile gaming market is ballooning at a rate that few expected. 2019 saw revenues for mobile gaming dwarf the individual revenue for console and PC gaming, so there is profit to be made. Ultimately, it falls to consumers to cast a critical eye on the endless propaganda that has invaded the internet, and now, our favorite YouTube content creators. The easy route might be to point an accusatory finger at the many content creators that have taken money to promote RAID: Shadow Legends, but that's not the correct course of action. Content creators have been learning the hard way over the past year that YouTube is not their friend, and it has become increasingly difficult to be monetized on the platform. The reality is that anyone who takes sponsorship money to promote RAID: Shadow Legends is just trying to keep the lights on, and they always disclose that "This video is brought to you by...", or something to that effect. In the same way that fry, if any of your favorite podcasters actually use Hello Fresh, MeUndies, or Squarespace, odds are that none of these YouTubers are genuinely excited to play this travesty of a game. Like Dave Chappelle says, his favorite thing happens to always be whoever paid him most recently. What a coincidence. At the end of the day, there is always someone trying to make the consumer part with their hard earned money, and with internet adds and sponsorship around every virtual corner, we as consumers need to squint hard and see what really lies beneath that glossy coat of paint. RAID: Shadow Legends is absolute trash in every sense of the word, but no one should be surprised after taking even a cursory glance. NEXT: Help Fight The Evil Forces Using Only Your Gaming PC There are more than 300 heroes in RAID Shadow Legends so you will have a tough choice which ones you want to level up and use and it's impossible to do that with all of them unless you really spend a fortune on the game. I have here a tierlist of all heroes that will show you how they perform in the different game modes and a total rating that's calculated to show you how viable a hero Anima-based. RAID Shadow Legends' gameplay is quite similar to those of other previous games of its type. A player is in charge of a group of four Champions, each equipped with at least two active skills. The playing order is determined by the character's pace. The players then choose which abilities will be deployed and when to use their advantages and foes' disadvantages in an attempt to win the battle. Although there are many different PvE and PvP components in RAID Shadow Legends, victory in battle is ultimately what matters. Therefore, it is significant to note that as the player advances through the game, a certain amount of content will eventually become playable on auto-play. This essentially means that the player will reach a point where he doesn't need to do anything to win battles if they have the appropriate squad and enough power. Four distinct ways of equipping and enhancing all Champions are available. That is their rank, level, talents, and ability, all of which have the potential to make a difference. And that is where RAID Shadow Legends is practically identical to some of the other Gachas. Still, it differs in one meaningful way, which is likely why it is more well-liked than those other games. It is the combined effect of the graphics with the game atmosphere they help to create. It's important to note that RAID Shadow Legends doesn't really add anything new to the Gacha mobile genre when discussing the ambience. Players must gather as many champions as possible and employ them in various game modes to receive multiple rewards, which helps enhance the collected roster. When it comes to the Champions, most are only available through summoning, and summon chances are comparable to those in other games. This means that players depend on luck and cannot plan their growth. While some Champions can be acquired through events, Fusion, or daily logins, the final strength of your squad will ultimately depend on RNG, which can be highly upsetting. It is crucial to note that the community has different opinions about it. Those players who play the game regularly give it a rating of 5. In contrast, everyone else, bothered by the continual ads on social media quickly gives it a rating of 1. Because of the strong marketing for RAID Shadow Legends, some players making the first hours of gameplay feel easy since nothing is really a challenge. At all times, RAID: Shadow Legends is pestering its players to spend real money. This is not an exaggeration, it often feels as though transitioning from virtually any screen causes a prompt to appear to purchase a Level 10 Pack, A Gem Pack, a Warrior Pack, or countless other real money purchases. At times this kicks into overdrive, and four or five prompts appear, one right after closing the one that came before. Worse still is the developer's inclusion of a countdown timer on each of these prompts that are supposed to indicate that this is a limited time offer, as if these parasites would ever reject a player's money. Via: reddit.com (u/elledaywalker) Now, we are not so naive as to state that a mobile game developer should not monetize their game. Every business needs to generate revenue to justify their costs or soon the entire operation will fold. With that said, consumers have been subjected to the worst, most manipulative monetization methods in the video game industry over the past few years, and RAID: Shadow Legends embodies the worst characteristics of all, because these purchases directly provide a spike to the overall power level of your characters. Are you stuck on a particularly difficult dungeon and don't want to grind for more gear? Use your Visa! Do you need more silver to equip a new weapon, because for some reason that costs in game currency? Break out the MasterCard! Are you dissatisfied with your rank in Arena against the teams boosted by other players and their credit cards? Then spend more money, or forever stay in the lowest ranks of "competitive" play, you filthy, poor casual! Ultimately, the problem is not that RAID: Shadow Legends hounds its users for money at every moment, it is that spending money is the only way to compete with other players. Fortnite raked in nearly $2 billion in 2019, conferring no competitive advantage to any of its players, so it's clearly not an impossible task. It's easy to dump on RAID: Shadow Legends because the developer's greed is immense and their sponsorship of YouTube content creators widespread, but they are not doing anything original with their predatory monetization model or their game. Marvel Strike Force most closely approximates the monetization model of RAID: Shadow Legends. Via: reddit.com (u/AbsemtmindedAshLore) There, players are also handed every other screen to spend ridiculous sums of money to improve their Captain America, or better gear their Yondu, all of which confer real advantages to both the Arena game mode and cooperative end-game raids. At least in that game there is some semblance of an end game, which is more than we can say for RAID: Shadow Legends, but in essence they both strive to rip as much money as possible away from their users. The fact is that the mobile gaming market is ballooning at a rate that few expected. 2019 saw revenues for mobile gaming dwarf the individual revenue for console and PC gaming, so there is profit to be made. Ultimately, it falls to consumers to cast a critical eye on the endless propaganda that has invaded the internet, and now, our favorite YouTube content creators. The easy route might be to point an accusatory finger at the many content creators that have taken money to promote RAID: Shadow Legends, but that's not the correct course of action. Content creators have been learning the hard way over the past year that YouTube is not their friend, and it has become increasingly difficult to be monetized on the platform. The reality is that anyone who takes sponsorship money to promote RAID: Shadow Legends is just trying to keep the lights on, and they always disclose that "This video is brought to you by...", or something to that effect. In the same way that fry, if any of your favorite podcasters actually use Hello Fresh, MeUndies, or Squarespace, odds are that none of these YouTubers are genuinely excited to play this travesty of a game. Like Dave Chappelle says, his favorite thing happens to always be whoever paid him most recently. What a coincidence. At the end of the day, there is always someone trying to make the consumer part with their hard earned money, and with internet adds and sponsorship around every virtual corner, we as consumers need to squint hard and see what really lies beneath that glossy coat of paint. RAID: Shadow Legends is absolute trash in every sense of the word, but no one should be surprised after taking even a cursory glance. NEXT: Help Fight The Evil Forces Using Only Your Gaming PC There are more than 300 heroes in RAID Shadow Legends so you will have a tough choice which ones you want to level up and use and it's impossible to do that with all of them unless you really spend a fortune on the game. I have here a tierlist of all heroes that will show you how they perform in the different game modes and a total rating that's calculated to show you how viable a hero Anima-based. RAID Shadow Legends' gameplay is quite similar to those of other previous games of its type. A player is in charge of a group of four Champions, each equipped with at least two active skills. The playing order is determined by the character's pace. The players then choose which abilities will be deployed and when to use their advantages and foes' disadvantages in an attempt to win the battle. Although there are many different PvE and PvP components in RAID Shadow Legends, victory in battle is ultimately what matters. Therefore, it is significant to note that as the player advances through the game, a certain amount of content will eventually become playable on auto-play. This essentially means that the player will reach a point where he doesn't need to do anything to win battles if they have the appropriate squad and enough power. Four distinct ways of equipping and enhancing all Champions are available. That is their rank, level, talents, and ability, all of which have the potential to make a difference. And that is where RAID Shadow Legends is practically identical to some of the other Gachas. Still, it differs in one meaningful way, which is likely why it is more well-liked than those other games. It is the combined effect of the graphics with the game atmosphere they help to create. It's important to note that RAID Shadow Legends doesn't really add anything new to the Gacha mobile genre when discussing the ambience. Players must gather as many champions as possible and employ them in various game modes to receive multiple rewards, which helps enhance the collected roster. When it comes to the Champions, most are only available through summoning, and summon chances are comparable to those in other games. This means that players depend on luck and cannot plan their growth. While some Champions can be acquired through events, Fusion, or daily logins, the final strength of your squad will ultimately depend on RNG, which can be highly upsetting. It is crucial to note that the community has different opinions about it. Those players who play the game regularly give it a rating of 5. In contrast, everyone else, bothered by the continual ads on social media quickly gives it a rating of 1. Because of the strong marketing for RAID Shadow Legends, some players making the first hours of gameplay feel easy since nothing is really a challenge. At all times, RAID: Shadow Legends is pestering its players to spend real money. This is not an exaggeration, it often feels as though transitioning from virtually any screen causes a prompt to appear to purchase a Level 10 Pack, A Gem Pack, a Warrior Pack, or countless other real money purchases. At times this kicks into overdrive, and four or five prompts appear, one right after closing the one that came before. Worse still is the developer's inclusion of a countdown timer on each of these prompts that are supposed to indicate that this is a limited time offer, as if these parasites would ever reject a player's money. Via: reddit.com (u/elledaywalker) Now, we are not so naive as to state that a mobile game developer should not monetize their game. Every business needs to generate revenue to justify their costs or soon the entire operation will fold. With that said, consumers have been subjected to the worst, most manip