"East of the sun and west of the moon" was collected by Peter Christen AshjÅ rnsen and JÅ rgen Moe. It is Arneáf "Thompson type 425A, the search for the lost husband; Other tales of this type include "Black Bull of Norroy", "the king of love", "the brown bear of Norway", "the daughter of the skies", "the enchanted pig", "the story of the hooded sweatshirt", "Maestro Semolina", "the rosemary sprig", "the enchanted snake", and "white-bear-king-valemon". [1] The Swedish version is called "Prince Hat under the ground". It was probably a progeny of the story of "Cupid and Psyche" in Golden Ass, which gave rise to similar animal husband cycles [2] as "Beauty and the Beast". [3] (See also, Amor and Psychiatry [4]) It was included by Andrew Lang in the Blue Fairy Book (1890). [5] Synopsis The white bear approaches a poor farmer and asks if he will give him the prettiest and younger daughter; In return, the bear will make the rich man. The girl is reluctant, so the farmer asks the bear to return, and in the meantime persuades her. The white bear takes it away in a rich and enchanted castle. At night, it takes away its bear shape to come to his bed as a man, although the lack of light means he never sees it. The princess holds the lamp to take a look at the mysterious prince. Illustration by John Batten for Joseph Jacobs's Fairy Book (1916). When he grows of nostalgia, the bear agrees that he could go home until she agrees that he never talks to his mother alone, but only when it comes to other people. At home, they welcome her, and her mother makes persistent attempts to talk to her alone, finally happening and persuadandola to tell the whole story. Listening to him, his mother insists that the white bear must really be a troll, gives her some candles, and tells her to light them at night, to see what she is sharing her bed. The younger daughter obeys, and finds that she is a very attractive prince, but she overthrows three drops of the fused sego on him, waking him. She tells her that if she held a year, she would be free, but now she has to go into her evil stepmother, which turned him into her form and lives in a castle east of the sun and west of the moon, and marries her horrible daughter, a troll princess. In the morning, the youngest daughter discovers that the palace isShe establishes in search of him. he. to a large mountain, find an old man playing with a golden apple. The youngest daughter asks if she knows the road to the castle east of the Sun and west of the Moon. The old woman can't tell her, but she lends her younger daughter a horse to reach a neighbor who might know, and gives her apple. The neighbor is sitting outside another mountain, with a golden carding comb. She also does not know the road to the castle east of the Sun and west of the Moon, but lends the younger daughter a horse to reach a neighbor who might know, and gives her carding-comb. The third neighbor has a golden spinning wheel. She also does not know the road to the castle east of the sun and west of the moon, but lends the younger daughter a horse to reach the east wind and gives her spinning wheel. The eastern wind has never been to the castle east of the Sun and west of the Moon, but its brother the western wind may have, being stronger. The door to the west wind. The western wind does the same, bringing it to the south wind; the south wind does the same, bringing it to the north wind. The North wind reports that once it blows up a leaf of aspen there, and it was exhausted after, but it will take her if she really wants to go. The younger daughter wants to go, and so she takes her there. The next morning, the youngest daughter comes out of the golden apple. The princess troll who had to marry the prince sees him and wants to buy him. The girl agrees, if she can spend the night with the prince. The princess troll accepts but gives the prince a sleeping drink, so that the younger daughter can not wake him up. The same thing happens the next night, after the youngest daughter pays the princess troll with golden postcards. During the attempts of the girl to wake up the prince, her crying and to call him is heard by some imprisoned citizens in the castle, who say the prince. On the third night, in exchange for the golden spinning wheel, the princess troll brings the drink, but the prince does not drink it, and so he is awake for the visit of the younger daughter. The prince tells her how he can save him: He will declare that he will marry anyone who can wash the drops of tallow from his shirt since the trolls, like his stepmother and his daughter, the princess troll, cannot do it. So instead, she will call the youngest daughter, and she will be able to do it, so she will marry him. The plan works, and the trolls, in anger, burst. The prince and his bride free prisoners in the castle, take gold and silver inside, and leave the castle east of the Sun and west of the Moon.
