The King, the Mice and the Cheese (1965) is a beautiful treasure that I found in a local market when our children were very young. It was such a buzz having occurred on it, and to be simultaneously able to justify the purchase. It was very similar to the experience of finding In the Night Kitchen for 80 cents at the St Andrews market in north east Melbourne. The bearded king and jewelled is having trouble with mice eating palace cheese. He enlists the help of the wise, who suggest that he leads to cats to get rid of mice. While this works well in the short term, first long, cats become a nuisance and must be eradicated. The solution? You can guess. And this continues and continues until it ends with elephants that lowers the palace. Get rid of elephants is easy. Bring the rats back. The king ends where he started. This time, however, takes a different approach. The mice and king agree to live together peacefully. He supplies them with cheese and, in turn, they eat with good manners. I love the ambition of this book. It is exotic, warm and welcoming. Very arab nights. Its materiality is a wonderful tactile reminiscence of the decade in which it was first published.
