Some and any can be tricky to use in English, as the difference between them is not always clear. This article provides a complete overview of when to use some or any, along with examples and exercises. In general, some is used in positive sentences. Similarly, words starting with some, like somebody and someone, are also used in positive sentences. For example: He has some issues with my friend. I have somebody to talk to at home. Some is also used when the exact amount of something is not important. In this context, some is used when you mean "a little" or "some". For instance: I have some friends. They want some apples. The general rule is that any is used in negative sentences and question sentences. Negative sentences are also sentences with never and without. It's essential to ensure the sentence has a negative meaning. This applies to any, but also to words starting with any, such as anybody, anything, and anyone. For example: I don't have any friends. He never talks to anyone. In some cases, any can be used in positive sentences when you mean "anyone" or "anything". For instance: Anything you find here is mine. Anyone here will help you if you're in trouble. Some can also be used in questions, but only when it's a request or a proposal. For example: Do you want some ice cream? Could I have some wine?
